Just makin' rain

Job upsets the tummy

By ROBERT BURNS

Associated Press Writer

OLYMPIA, Wash. (AP) — There may be some glory in being "rainmaker" to dry Eastern Washington, but University of Washington meteorologist Peter Hobbs says it's no fun.

The four-hour airplane ride through stormy, plane-jolting clouds and an unstable air can make some stomachs think it has replaced your lunch.

How does the 41-year-old University of Washington weather modification expert take it?

"I usually throw up," he said before leaving Monday on his first mission.

He plans to make at least 30 more missions over the Cascade Mountains' eastern slope in his effort to bring rain relief to the parched Eastern Washington farmlands.

The initial trip was a successful one, he said after returning to solid ground.

"It went reasonably well for the first flight," he said. "We found some quite suitable clouds and used all of our 'dry ice'."

He also reported he was able to keep his stomach down.

The light DC-3 that normally holds 24 passengers looks much like a crop dusting plane as it swoops over the silver and white clouds covering the crest of the Cascades.

A hardly-visible trail of dry ice aimed at hand-picked clouds falls from the bottom of the plane.

He and his crew of four other UW atmospheric science experts dropped 400 pounds of dry ice on clouds near Ellensburg and Cle Elum during the three-hour flight.

The ice is expected to increase the rainmaking capacity of the clouds. The ultimate goal of the $125,000 project is to shift much of the snowpack that normally covers the central Cascades to its eastern slopes, creating a heavier snowpack for the drought-stricken Yakima Valley and other Eastern Washington areas.
